ESCORTS

Escorts are asked to present themselves at the Myrtle Room (Fifth Avenue end of the Astor Gallery) by 12.15 P. M.

Entrance to the Myrtle Room (which is reserved exclusively for the guests of the Society and Escorts) by special ticket, which must be presented to the guard at the door.

Kindly make yourself known to Col. Robert Mazet or Mr. James R. Magoffin, Committee of Reception. Assist in identifications and introductions.

When the bugle sounds for Luncheon it is most essential that each Escort and his guest be in the Myrtle Room.

In the Procession of Honour each pair of guest and escort are numbered in the Seating List. No. 1 is first. When the numbers are called see that your number is in the proper place. Do not come into the procession until your number is called. When the procession moves walk with extreme slowness; this is essential that the procession be kept together.

Leave your guest at the end of the platform by which the Table of Honour is approached. The first pair is precisely in the centre; possibly the second and third; the remainder of the procession is arranged in the order of the seating, so that, after the centre party the next one is at the extreme far end of the table as it is entered. No Escort should go behind the Table under any circumstances.

If these arrangements are modified, look for a second version of this paper in the Myrtle Room.

The Luncheon

A memorable occasion, truly, and one deserving of the highest rank in the history of The Pennsylvania Society. It was in every way fitting for the very distinguished guest in whose special honour this festivity had been arranged. It was a thrilling moment when Marshal Foch, escorted by President Schwab entered the vast dinner hall, which was thronged in every part. Not only was the main floor crowded with tables, but additional tables were placed in the boxes, entirely filling the grand tier and most of the boxes in the second tier. There was no space available for late comers.

The procession of honour was the longest in the history of the Society, and comprised nearly two hundred persons. The banner and flags of the Society were carried by American soldiers from Governors Island, under the command of Lieut. J. E. Raymond, and were especially detailed for this service by the Commanding General. The Paulist Choristers in cassocks and surplices gave a special note to the procession, to which additional colour was given by the uniforms of the French officers.

A special reception committee, consisting of President Schwab, Governor Sproul and Director Ferree, awaited Marshal Foch at the entrance to the Hotel, No. 1 West 33rd St. There an animated spectacle was presented. The sidewalks as far as one could see from the steps, were thronged with people and every window within sight had its group of spectators. The street had been cleared immediately in front of the doorway, and there a platoon of police in column formation, awaited the arrival of our distinguished guest. For the first time (and at the request of the Society) the hotel had laid a rich red carpet on the sidewalk. The banner and flags of the Society, carried by the soldiers, formed a court of honour. High police officials superintended the direction of the police and the care of the waiting people. With the placing of the flags all the preliminary arrangements were completed. There was a slight pause. Then suddenly a police whistle, and what, but a moment before had been an open stretch of street, partly occupied with the column of police, seemed filled with motor cars. The Marshal of France had arrived.

The cars emptied and the party moved into the hotel. The entrance corridors and every point of vantage was filled with people, guests in the hotel, who had long stood waiting to see Marshal Foch. An orderly gathering, well kept in hand by the admirable police service of the hotel. The party went at once to Room 106, which had been reserved as a special reception room for the Marshal. Here preliminary introductions were completed. The Marshal graciously autographed two or three menus for the archives of the Society, and also a copy of his "Eloge de Napoleon", a handsomely bound copy from the collection of the Director, and which was probably the last document he expected to see under such circumstances. The Marshal's party was so large and so animated, that The Pennsylvania Society, in the few representatives there gathered, seemed completely swallowed up and absorbed in it. But it was an invasion of the French, very, very welcome to us.

Thence to the Astor Gallery, where the other special guests and escorts had assembled. The procession was quickly formed, and the long column, to the sound of drums and bugles, moved to the grand ballroom.

LUNCHEON FOR MARSHAL FOCH. FACSIMILE OF TIME NOTICE SENT OUT WITH THE ADMISSION CARDS

As is always the case at the Society's functions, a great deal of care and taste had been displayed in the decorations, which had been designed by Mr. Horace Moran, committee on decoration. A great screen of white curtains hung behind the guest table, divided into long panels by ropes of green laurel, and having in each panel two crossed flags of the principal nations engaged in the late war. The sign PENNSYLVANIA gleamed aloft in electric lights, and a group of American flags crowned the whole. An admirable, distinguished and effective background to our table of distinguished guests, and forming a fine setting for the great company of ladies and gentlemen that crowded the huge room. The balcony fronts were covered with greens, and as the procession of honour moved into the room the Paulist Choristers had already gained the places in the musicians' gallery at the top of the back, where the fresh boy faces with their white surplices made a final crown to the decorative features of the room.

While the guests were taking their places the flags were distributed through the room and left aloft by the soldier-bearers. President Schwab rapped for order; the Chaplain invoked God's blessing; the choir sang a verse of the hymn "America" and the preliminary exercises were completed.

The speaking programme was limited to President Schwab's address when he presented the Gold Medal of the Society to Marshal Foch, and the Marshal's own brief reply. It is generally known that the Marshal does not speak or understand English; it seemed quite unnecessary, therefore, to subject him to the burden of listening to addresses in a tongue he did not understand. Moreover his time was exceedingly limited, for his engagements for the day were very numerous and we could not justly ask him to make a prolonged stay. Weeks of arduous labour, therefore, found fruition in about an hour and a half; time neither too long nor too brief to give The Pennsylvania Society its most notable event.

The Marshal's reply to Mr. Schwab was delivered in French. Each sentence, as he uttered it, was immediately translated and given in English by Col. Francis E. Drake, who stood close beside him during its delivery. Col. Drake has a fine, resonant voice, so that the Marshal's remarks not only reached his hearers in the language they could understand, but doubtless reached also the ears of the deaf that have so strange a passion for attending public dinners.

The fine singing by the Paulist Choristers was particularly effective. A verse of "America" was sung immediately after grace. When Mr. Schwab announced "The President of the United States" at the opening of his remarks, a verse of the "Star-Spangled Banner" was sung. At the conclusion, when he presented the Gold Medal to Marshal Foch, they sang a verse of "The Marsellaise". At its conclusion the Marshal made his acknowledgments of the honour done him by the Society.

LUNCHEON FOR MARSHAL FOCH. FACSIMILE OF GUEST TICKET

No account of this remarkable occasion would be at all complete without some reference to a number of things that were not known or visible to the assembled company. Doubtless few in the ballroom saw the miniature pieces of artillery, guns and tanks, that were placed on the guest table, but there they were. No one, perhaps, saw the special menu that was prepared for Marshal Foch. This was an exceedingly sumptuous affair, bound in hand-tooled French red levant, lined with white moire silk and enclosed in a case of red levant lined with gray suede, a beautiful and costly souvenir that surely no other organization that entertained the Marshal had thought to prepare for him.

Of less moment, but a part of the history of the day was the fact that as the Marshal was slightly later in arriving than had been expected, it was necessary to supply luncheon for the soldier flag-bearers and for the choristers, all of whom had expected to return to their respective headquarters for their noon meal. It is needless to say that the Society was very pleased to arrange these little details.

Through the courtesy of the Police Commissioner, two officers from the Traffic Squad were especially assigned to duty under the direction of the Society, inside the hotel. Veritable giants and astoundingly beautiful, these officers stationed at the entrance to the Myrtle Room were huge towers of strength that measurably added to the picturesqueness of the assembly.

The Menu was exceedingly beautiful and sumptuous. The design of the cover, with the exception of the inserts of the Statue of Liberty and the Eiffel Tower was taken from panel decorations in the Hall of Mirrors, in the palace of Versailles—the room in which the Peace Treaty was signed. It was printed in a light amber tint, the lines being sunk deep into the substance of the paper, which was heavy Italian hand-made stock, technically known as Lombardia. A centre panel, bearing the title, was smooth-pressed in intaglio, with the inscription printed in black and embossed.

This exquisite cover embraced eight pages of a French hand-made stock, known as Arches. The first page was blank. The second carried a portrait of Marshal Foch, engraved on steel, and was protected by a leaf of fine tissue. The third page carried a translation of the Report of Premier Clemenceau to the President of the French Republic, dated August, 1918, wherein it was recommended that General Foch have conferred on him the title of Marshal of France; immediately below was the presidential decree conferring this high distinction.

ORNAMENT FROM THE LUNCHEON MENU

Marshal Foch

Report to the President of the French Republic, August, 1918.

To the President:

The decree of December 24, 1916, revived for the first time the dignity of Marshal of France [for General Joffre]. I have the honour to submit for your signature in the name of the Government, and, I can affirm, in the name of all France, a decree conferring on General Foch this high national recompense. At the hour when the enemy, by a formidable offensive on a front of 100 kilometres, sure to win the decision and impose on us a German peace which would mark the enslavement of the world, General Foch and his admirable soldiers conquered.

Paris disengaged, Soissons and Château-Thierry reconquered in full battle, more than 200 villages delivered, 35,000 prisoners, 700 cannon captured, the hopes haughtily proclaimed by the enemy before his attack fell, the glorious allied armies thrown with a single bound from the shores of the Marne to the banks of the Aisne, such are the results of a manœuvre as admirably conceived by the High Command as superbly executed by the incomparable chiefs.

The confidence placed by the Republic and by all the Allies in the conqueror of the Marais de St. Gond, in the illustrious chief of the Yser and the Somme, has been fully justified.

The dignity of Marshal of France, conferred on General Foch, will not moreover be a recompense for his past services, it will consecrate still better in the future the authority of the great man of war called to conduct the armies of the Entente to the definite victory.

CLEMENCEAU

DECREE

Article 2: The Minister of War is charged with the execution of this decree.

The fifth page announced the presentation of the Gold Medal of the Society to Marshal Foch. The seventh page reproduced the remarkable tribute to France, given by the late President Roosevelt in his great address to the Society at the annual dinner on December 8, 1917:

“The marvelous French Republic, which stands forever as both the most charming and the most heroic figure among all the great nations of mankind. France embodies all of loveliness and all of valour; beauty is her hand-maiden and strength her shield-bearer; and the shining courage of her daughters has matched the courage of her dauntless sons. For three years and a half she has walked high of heart through the valley of the shadow. Her body is in torture, but her forehead is alight with the beauty of the morning. Never in all history has there been such steadfast loyalty in the doing of dangerous duty, such devotion to country, such splendour of service and of sacrifice. And great shall be her reward, for she has saved the soul of the world.”

Marshal Foch

LUNCHEON FOR MARSHAL FOCH. FACSIMILE OF THE MARSHAL'S PLACE CARD AT TABLE OF HONOUR

In addition to the Menu there was placed at each plate a copy of the pamphlet by Dr. James Hosmer Penniman, entitled "Our Debt to France" and "What Lafayette did for America." These booklets were contributed to the Luncheon by Mr. Rodman Wanamaker, to whose generous thoughtfulness this additional note of interest was provided.

It is not, unhappily, the custom of the members of the Society to make known to the Dinner Committee any impress made by its functions. It is, therefore, impossible for those immediately concerned with them to know or understand the impression made upon the spectators and participants. However one or two quotations may be given.

"I cannot leave town," wrote the Hon. James M. Beck, "without congratulating you on the great Foch Luncheon. . . . Schwab did splendidly."

"Just a moment," wrote a member from Philadelphia, "to express to you the admiration I have for the dignity and military precision with which the Foch Luncheon was carried off last Saturday. I have never seen a luncheon of this magnitude handled so successfully, with everybody happy and all appreciating the distinguished character of the occasion."

From ladies:

"My very warmest congratulation upon the unqualified success of The Pennsylvania Society Luncheon to Marshal Foch. The luncheon was perfect, the decorations beautiful, and the quotation from Theodore Roosevelt brought tears to my eyes. . . . It was a great privilege to be so close to the world's most distinguished citizen."

"It was perfectly grand! The entire affair was superb."

"The Foch Luncheon was a great success—everything was wonderfully arranged. . . . The concensus of opinion all around us was that it was a wonderful success."

Affairs like the Foch Luncheon not only require weeks of exacting preparation, but call for much printed matter. It has long been the custom of the Society to put everything relating to its functions into type. Many of these printed papers, being intended for specific and limited use, are quite unknown to the membership at large. In order that the present record may be as complete as possible, all the printed matter issued in connection with the Foch Luncheon is here reproduced in facsimile. It is not possible, because of its larger size, to reproduce the menu in complete facsimile, but all its parts are here shown.

In an earlier portion of this summary the appearance of Marshal Foch and his personal party is referred to as a French invasion. As a matter of fact the affair was quite the opposite. The French people in the person of its most distinguished soldier and his companions did not invade the purlieus of the Society, but the Society, in the person of its President, captured the Marshal. That the Society should have Marshal Foch as its guest was a matter that lay very close to Mr. Schwab's heart. Even to a man of his commanding position, with the added advantage of a personal acquaintance with the Marshal during the actual conduct of the war, this was no slight task. The daily press kept the people of the United States well informed as to the demands made on the Marshal for his time and presence, and from the moment that he set foot in America, it was apparent these accounts had not been exaggerated. Mr. Schwab may or may not count Marshal Foch's acceptance of his invitation as among the great successes of his career; but it certainly ranks among the great successes of The Pennsylvania Society. He left nothing undone that could be done to secure the end he sought. And there were some dark moments when it seemed as though Mr. Schwab's great prestige would fail him. But that he was finally successful everyone now knows, and this record is but an outline account of a very great event. It is but the simple truth to add that the Society owes Mr. Schwab a debt of lasting gratitude for the great privilege he obtained for it in entertaining Marshal Foch.

One by one the great figures in the war with Germany have visited America. It has not been possible for The Pennsylvania Society to entertain all of these heroic personages individually; but in entertaining the greatest of them all—the heroic Foch—it has, in a sense, expressed its gratitude for the men who so successfully laboured for right and for civilization. All the records of the Foch Luncheon remain with the Society, including the individual subscription forms and the immense correspondence connected with it. It is hoped that some time these may be classified and mounted into scrap books as a lasting and complete record of an event in the Society's history that must fill the heart of every member with pride and satisfaction.

Toasts

The President of the United States and the President of France.
Our Guest, Marshal Foch.

Address of Mr. Charles M. Schwab President of the Society

Marshal Foch, our Distinguished Guest,

Ladies and Gentlemen of The Pennsylvania Society:

I speak to-day with some hesitancy, in view of the fact that our Distinguished Guest has had speeches read and delivered to him a dozen times a day since his visit to this country, and while I had thought of many things that I might say with reference to his wonderful military achievements and the fact that he is the greatest military man in the history of the world, when it is in the bosom of the family of The Pennsylvania Society we, the sons of Pennsylvania, may speak from the heart, in an informal way, the thoughts which are in our minds, as we would say them in the bosom of our family if this great Marshal were one of our family guests.

The thought that comes to me first is very similar to that which we enjoyed upon our last luncheon when we entertained a great and distinguished man:—that great as is his character from a military and statesmanship point of view, the thing that impresses me most, and, indeed, of which he is the proudest, is the fact that he is a simple citizen of France as we are simple citizens of the United States and that he likes most to be called a man of democratic and simple ideas and mode of life. The lessons of the war which he has so justly won for civilized humanity, he practices within himself in his everyday life. For example, when I said to him to-day, "Marshal, you must be worn out with this round of receiving and festivities and all the duties that you have to attend to," he said, "My dear friend, this is a great pleasure. It was during the war, when the movement of a great body of soldiers meant perhaps the loss of thousands or tens of thousands of lives, that my mind was truly worried and upon which I had to think with great depth, but here amongst my friends in America, the country that is so closely linked with my own country, I have nothing but supreme happiness in meeting all of its people, and I wish it were within my power physically to do that which is in my mind mentally, and that is to grasp every American man and woman by the hand and proclaim them and be honoured in calling them my friend."

I spoke at the Iron and Steel Dinner last night. I told the Marshal what the great State of Pennsylvania had done for the iron and steel production of the World War; that out of the 50 million tons of steel supplied for the war, more than 40 million of those tons came from the State of Pennsylvania. It is hard to conceive what 50 million tons of steel means to the lay mind, but you might grasp it if I tell you that 50 million tons of steel would build a railway about ten times around this earth. I might tell you that we dreamed the dream of a bridge of ships across the Atlantic, and yet 50 million tons of steel placed in the hulls of ships would actually make a bridge from America to France. And that is what we have done in the State of Pennsylvania. We do not claim, my dear Marshal, that we have in any way won the war; we are all prone to boast what we have done; but we are proud of your commendation and your approval in saying that we have done our duty. The Marshal has said, when I congratulated him a few moments ago upon his wonderful accomplishments, "My dear Mr. Schwab, we have done nothing more than every loyal citizen of every country did, and that was: his best under all circumstances."

Ladies and Gentlemen of The Pennsylvania Society, our chief kindness to this great man is to do as much as we can to save his physical strength. He has to meet thousands of people and thousands of Societies, and we are not going to indulge in long speeches or anything of that sort. Suffice it to say that I regard this as a red letter day in The Pennsylvania Society. We have here a man as our guest to-day who has distinguished this, our Society, from the other Societies, who will go down in history as the greatest figure, politically and militarily, that ever lived in the history of the world; a man that commanded at one time nearly 7 millions of troops in the fields. Gentlemen, we play with material things of great magnitude and think we are doing wonderful things, but compare our deeds to those of this man who had within his hands the movements of 7 million human lives and the responsibility that devolved upon him in so doing, and the splendid manner in which he has acquitted himself for this great era of civilization! I spoke last night the words that any patriotic Pennsylvanian would have spoken with reference to the great armament works—with which the Marshal is so familiar—at Bethlehem and said that if peace would come and peace could be assured, we would gladly sink them to the bottom of the sea and forget that they ever existed. But if works are necessary, if establishments like Bethlehem are necessary for the protection of our homes and our families and our firesides, we will up-build them and defend them with the same energy that we will scrap them in the interest of peace.

Now, my friends, there is much that might be said upon an occasion of this kind. For me, I am satisfied,—although I had met the Marshal in France before, I am satisfied to have seen him, to have studied his character more intimately, as we do upon occasions of this sort, to have you, my friends of Pennsylvania, see this man, to have you transmit to your children and through them to your children's children, this historical event in which this great and distinguished Marshal has honoured us.

It has been the practice of The Pennsylvania Society to bestow a Medal of Honour upon men of great distinction. Our distinguished French Ambassador here has been the recipient of this medal heretofore in years gone by. I am sure the Ambassador will agree with me that never has The Pennsylvania Society at any time honoured themselves more, or more worthily bestowed the Gold Medal of the Society than they do when they present it to Marshal Foch. And so, my friends, bearing the deepest mark of appreciation, amounting, indeed, my dear Marshal Foch, to almost reverence, we, the people from Pennsylvania present to you, with all the love and all the good wishes that can be contained in the true American heart, the Medal of The Pennsylvania Society, the best token that is within our power to present.

(As Marshal Foch rose to receive the Medal from President Schwab, the Paulist Choristers sang a verse of "The Marseillaise," the entire company standing. Amid great applause Marshal Foch began his address.)

Address of Marshal Foch

Pennsylvania during the War not only sent us an immense material assistance, but sent us an immense moral assistance, sent us the assistance of all kinds, imbued at all times with one idea, that of victory. But the Pennsylvania Society has reserved for me a very agreeable, a very splendid surprise; this surprise has been in this remarkable, this touching, this affectionate welcome which you have extended to me to-day. And since The Pennsylvania Society considers itself as a family, I ask The Pennsylvania Society to consider me as a member of the family. I shall keep this Medal of The Pennsylvania Society as a talisman, I shall keep it as a souvenir, which will remain with me for always, of this great Society, and I thank you from the bottom of my heart for the reception which you have given me to-day and for this token of that affection.

The President:

The great Marshal says again that while he would be happy to receive everybody, it is utterly impossible. He wishes you to accept his wish for the act and to excuse him, because he has another important engagement for every hour of the day, and if the ladies and gentlemen will remain seated until I have escorted the Marshal out of the room we will indeed be pleased.

The meeting is now adjourned and I thank you all kindly for the reception to the Marshal, which he greatly appreciated.

The Press and the Foch Luncheon

[Thomas F. Healey in The Public Ledger, Philadelphia, November 20, 1921.]

Men and women of Pennsylvania to-day tendered Marshal Ferdinand Foch the chief honour of a day of triumphant honours by the citizens of New York. The Marshal was the guest of The Pennsylvania Society of New York at luncheon in the Waldorf Astoria. The medal of the Society was pinned upon his breast by Charles M. Schwab. Then he was acclaimed by Mr. Schwab and more than 1000 Pennsylvanians as the greatest military hero of history; as a great statesman, but withal a simple, courteous, democratic gentleman.

Mr. Schwab, president of the Society, told the Marshal he knew of no greater tribute to pay him than to say that the people of America, and particularly the people of Pennsylvania, feel for him all the love which honest American hearts are capable of expressing.

"You practice in your daily life the great lessons of the war," said Mr. Schwab. "We of Pennsylvania will try to emulate you. We did what we could to aid you in your great struggle for civilization. Pennsylvania sent you men and steel. We sent you 40,000,000 tons of steel. We sent you our faith and hope, and so to-day we greet you as the greatest military genius and hero of history.

"Last night I spoke words in your presence which any real American, any true Pennsylvanian would speak. I said we would gladly sink our works in the ocean if they stood in the way of peace. I say that now, but if the upbuilding of those plants is necessary to our defense and our progress, we will maintain them and improve them with the same energy that we will scrap them if required to do so in the interest of peace."

Mr. Schwab was the only speaker. When he had pinned the medal of honour upon the Marshal's breast, the conqueror of Germany arose and electrified the audience by displaying an amazing knowledge of some of the things Pennsylvania had done during the war.

"I know that Pennsylvania sent us great amounts of materials of all sorts," he said. "I know that her men were among the finest who crossed the sea. I know your hopes and aspirations were always with us, that you always were intent upon victory.

"I am deeply touched by this remarkable and affectionate greeting. Mr. Schwab said you considered yourselves members of a great big family. I am glad to hear that because I want to be admitted to that family circle.

"This medal I shall always keep as a token of your kindness, your appreciation and as one of the chief honours bestowed upon me in America."

From the moment he entered the Waldorf portals until he marched into the dining room escorted by Mr. Schwab at the head of a gala procession of honour, Marshal Foch was greeting Pennsylvanians, resident in New York, and from towns all over the Keystone State, who were here as guests of the Society. Immediately behind the Marshal and Mr. Schwab walked Ambassador Jusserand and Governor Sproul.

While the dinner was in progress the Paulist Choristers stationed in a balcony sang patriotic hymns of France and America. Marshal Foch, showing not the slightest strain of his strenuous round of receptions and dinners, engaged in animated conversation with Mr. Schwab, Bishop Garland, Governor Sproul and others at the table. When he spoke his voice rang through the crowded ballroom with the strength and vigour of a man half his age.

The reception given him when he stood in his place to speak was remarkable. Every eye was centered upon the warrior in blue. Every voice was raised in praise of him. With gestures that signified the ultimate in what we Americans designate "punch" he volleyed forth his words of praise and commendation for the works and the merits of the people of Pennsylvania.

When he had finished Mr. Schwab again arose and again told him that Americans marveled at his greatness.

"We cannot say too much to honour you, my dear Marshal," said Mr. Schwab. "When we contemplate the task you performed our imagination, our power of expression fail us."

Turning to the members of the Society, Mr. Schwab, placing his hand upon the Marshal's shoulder, said:

"Great as is this man's character from the military and statesmanship point of view, you should know that he is great in many other respects. He is not only proud to be a soldier; he is proud to be a citizen of France, a simple democratic citizen of our sister republic.

"He is an intrepid man. When I said to him to-day, 'Marshal, you must be quite worn out with the exertions put upon you by this incessant demand for your presence that we may do you honour,' he said to me: 'It is a great pleasure. When we were in the field of battle, when it was my duty to direct movements of great bodies of troops, then, indeed, I had to think deeply. But now I find pleasure. I love to meet your great people and do honour to them.'

"That is the simplicity of the man who directed the movements of 7,000,000 human beings."

But despite the strength and willingness displayed by Marshal Foch in attending so many dinners, luncheons and receptions, Mr. Schwab asked the members of the Society to permit the Marshal to depart without a personal greeting to each individual present.

"He would gladly shake the hand of each of you," said Mr. Schwab, "but instead of that he expresses his love for each of you."

[The Inquirer, Philadelphia, November 20, 1921.]

"Consider me a member of your own family." These words of Marshal Ferdinand Foch's electrified the 1200 members of The Pennsylvania Society and their guests assembled at luncheon in the Waldorf-Astoria to honour him by presenting a gold medal.

Marshal Foch spoke in French, but so simple, so kindly and sincere were his words that they leaped across the barrier of language, and long before the translator had opportunity to catch up with him the greater part of the assemblage had grasped his meaning and started to cheer.

They had just been told by Charles M. Schwab, the president of the Society, who had made the presentation, that Marshal Foch was far prouder of being a simple citizen of France than he was of being the greatest military leader of the ages, with 7,000,000 men at his command, and here was proof positive of this fact.

It was a gathering which included not only the Pennsylvanians present, but all those who were not there as well. There was something delightfully home-like and informal about the whole atmosphere of the occasion. Foch, the stern commander, receded into infinite distance, and in his place stood Foch, the man. There were many distinguished men at the luncheon to honour the doughty little French warrior, and those at the speaker's table included Governor William C. Sproul, of Pennsylvania, George W. Wickersham, member of President Roosevelt's Cabinet, and a former president of The Pennsylvania Society; M. Casenave, Minister Plenipotentiary, Director of French services in the United States; Count Charles de Chambrun; Gaston Liebert, French Consul-General in New York; Col. Franklin D'Olier, of the American Legion; Darwin P. Kingsley and James M. Beck, Solicitor General of the United States. M. Jusserand, French Ambassador, arrived late and received an ovation of his own, as he went to greet the guest of honour.

Amid a tremendous demonstration the guests of honour entered the room, led by Marshal Foch and Mr. Schwab. . . . The rendering of the "Star-Spangled Banner," "America," and "The Marseillaise" by the Paulist Choristers was an impressive feature of the luncheon. The whole affair was made necessarily brief by the fact that Marshal Foch had to hasten up to Columbia University.

LUNCHEON FOR MARSHAL FOCH. ORNAMENT FROM THE MENU

Ferdinand Foch *

Marshal of France

Ferdinand Foch was born at Tarbes, France, August 4, 1851; his father at that time was secretary of the Prefecture. He studied in the colleges of Tarbes and Rodez, and with the Jesuits at Polignan, and then went to the Jesuit college of St. Mihiel at St. Étienne. In 1869 he attended the Jesuit college of St. Clement at Metz. He entered the war of 1870 as a volunteer, but the armistice was signed before he had completed his period of instruction.

* This brief sketch of Marshal Foch follows in outline the admirable introduction by the Commandant A. Grasset to his book "Préceptes et Jugements du Maréchal Foch." This outline of the Marshal's military career was also published in "L'Illustration" for March 15, 1919, illustrated with maps of the Marshal's battles in France. The maps in Commandant Grasset's book are chiefly illustrative of the Marshal's comments on the art of war. The book, together with the historical introduction has been translated by Hilaire Belloc and published under the title of "Precepts and Judgments" by Marshal Foch. The maps that appeared in the French edition, as well as those in "L'Illustration" are omitted from the English version. The book is a text-book summarizing Marshal's Foch's military principles in concise and handy form. It presents the permanent principles of warfare on which he constructed his strategy. He presents the problem historically and technically, and gives the laws of military command.

Other sources used in the present sketch were: "Le Commandant Unique. Première Partie. Foch et les Armées d'Occident" by Mermeix, from which the list of "Battle of Foch" has been drawn. An admirable review of the military events of 1918, with outlines of the earlier history of the war, is given in General Mangin's remarkable book, "Comment finit la Guerre." Other excellent books are "Le Chemin de la Victoire (1914-1918)" and "La Bataille de France (21 Mars-11 Novembre, 1918)" both by Louis Madelin. This author quite fails to do justice to the American co-operation in the war; which, however, is fully given by General Mangin in his book. A very recent publication on Marshal Foch is the series of papers by Paul Painlevé, "Comment j'ai nommé Foch et Pétain" published in "La Revue de Paris" beginning with the number for December, 1921.

November 1, 1871, he became a student at École Polytechnique. In 1873 he was at Fontainebleau. In 1875 he was lieutenant in the 24th Artillery. In 1878 he was captain of the 10th Regiment of Artillery. He entered the École Supérieure de Guerre in 1885. He remained with the staff of the division of Montpellier until 1891, when he was promoted chief of squadron and was called to the Third Bureau of the Staff of the Army. After having commanded the mounted batteries of the 13th Regiment of Artillery, he was recalled to the staff of the Army, and on October 31 was named adjunct professor of military history, strategy and applied tactics at the École Supérieure de Guerre. In 1896 he became lieutenant-colonel and full professor.

Always a devout Catholic, with a brother a Jesuit, the anti-clerical criticism of the time caused Lieutenant-Colonel Foch's retirement from the École Supérieure de Guerre in 1901, when he was sent to join a regiment. In 1903 he became colonel and was placed in command of the 35th Regiment of Artillery at Vannes. In 1905 he was chief of staff of the Fifth Army Corps at Orléans. In 1907 he became Brigadier-General and was placed on the Staff of the Army. Shortly after M. Clemenceau made him commandant of the École de Guerre. In 1911 he became General of Division with command of the 13th Division at Chaumont; in 1912 he was commandant of the 8th Army Corps and, on August, 23, 1913, commandant of the 20th Corps at Nancy.

It was with the troops of the 20th Corps that General Foch began his career in the great war with Germany. The 20th Corps formed part of the Second Army, commanded by General de Castelnau, and held a portion of the frontier, where some of the earliest conflicts were fought in the vicinity of Nancy. To follow in detail the military career of General Foch would be to sketch almost the entire history of the war; only a few special points can be noted here. He commanded the Ninth Army in the first battle of the Marne, succeeding which he became adjunct to the Commander-in-Chief, General Joffre, with the special duty of co-ordinating the operations of the French armies of the North, in which capacity he took a notable part in the battle of the Yser. He directed the following battle of Artois, and in the battle of the Somme commanded the groups of armies of Fayolle and Micheler.

On September 30, 1916, General Foch attained the age by which he would have retired from active service by the existing law: the Government gave him the Military Medal and retained him in active service. At that time he was considered as a successor in the high command to General Joffre, but was passed over on the alleged ground of ill health. General Joffre refused to be separated from so valuable an associate, and on December 13, 1916, obtained from the Government the creation of a Bureau of Studies of the great inter-allied questions, and confided its direction to General Foch. An elaborate study of the defense of Switzerland, in case its neutrality would be violated by the Germans as they had done in Belgium, followed. May 15, 1917, General Foch became chief of the General Staff, replacing General Pétain, who had become commandant of the Armies of the North and North-East.

In October, 1917, the Austrian-German campaign against Italy began, and French troops were sent to Italy, where General Foch quickly followed them. Meanwhile the Germans had matured their plans for their great offensive of the spring of 1918 an eventuality that General Foch had foreseen in November, 1917. The tragedies of that dreadful series of battles need not be rehearsed here. It is sufficient to point out that the Allies were thoroughly alarmed, and the long-discussed necessity for a unity of allied command was brought to a head. At a meeting held on March 26, 1918, at Doullens, General Foch on the proposition of the British Government, was charged to co-ordinate the operations of the Allied armies; before the month was over he was designated Generalissimo of the French, English, American and Belgian forces fighting on the Western Front.

The great moment of his career had arrived. The great campaign from its beginnings in the dark hours of March to its triumphal conclusion in November, 1918, was the "Battle of Foch." The whole history of the war in Western Europe is summed up in his name. Yet General Foch himself fought no battles in this remarkable campaign, and personally led no troops. His place was at the Grand Headquarters General, and in a quiet and retired spot he directed millions of men, conquered utterly a bitter and resourceful foe, and superintended events that emancipated humanity and
